Human Rights Committee Consideration of the 5th Periodic Report of Spain

International Commission of Jurists

Submission on list of issues

The International Commission of Jurists (ICJ) wishes to provide its views to the Human Rights Committee, in advance of the preparation of the list of issues for the Periodic Report of Spain. In this short submission, the ICJ highlights several issues which it considers should be of particular concern to the Committee in its consideration of the Spanish report.

In particular, the ICJ is concerned that the law and procedure regarding garde à vue and incommunicado detention, and the limited safeguards the law provides for detainees, fail to adequately protect against torture or ill-treatment by police or other state officials, contrary to Article 7 ICCPR. These problems are particularly acute in regard to those held on charges of terrorism or organised crime, who may be detained incommunicado for up to 13 days. A further issue of concern is the restriction on defence rights resulting from the secreto de sumario investigation procedure. In the course of its hearings, the ICJ Eminent Jurists Panel on Terrorism, Counter-terrorism and Human Rights has heard serious concerns on all of these issues from Spanish lawyers.

In this submission, the ICJ also highlights concerns regarding the credible allegations of Spain’s involvement in the CIA run programme of renditions, and the reliance of Spanish courts on diplomatic assurances against torture in extradition proceedings.

Police and incommunicado detention

As a general rule under Spanish law, following arrest, a suspect must be released or brought before a judge within 72 hours.\(^1\) However, a judge can extend this by 48 hours in terrorism cases, to allow a total of 5 days police or garde à vue detention.\(^2\) Those

---

\(^1\) Code of Criminal Procedure (CCP), Article 520(1)
\(^2\) CCP Article 520 bis. The Constitution makes general provision that preventative detention may last no longer than the time strictly necessary to carry out investigations and that the arrested person must be set free or handed over to the judicial authorities within a maximum period of 72 hours, but it states that this suspected of terrorism or organised crime may also be made subject to incommunicado detention for a total of up to 13 days, justified on the grounds of the seriousness of the crimes and the need to protect the integrity of the investigation. ³ Under the Spanish Criminal Procedure Act⁴ as amended⁵ a five day period of incommunicado police detention can be ordered by a judge. At the end of this period, a judge can issue those suspected of terrorism or organised crime related offences with a further five days of incommunicado detention, this time in prison custody, and another three days may be added at any time – either immediately following the ten day period or at a later date, where “the development of investigations or of the trial gives good reasons for this measure”.⁶ During incommunicado detention, suspects cannot notify relatives about their detention, receive or send correspondence, meet visitors, or designate their own lawyer. They are instead assigned a lawyer, with whom they are not permitted to consult in private.⁷ Incommunicado detainees have the right to be visited and examined by a police medical examiner and, since a 2003 law, by a second forensic medical examiner appointed by a judge.⁸ However, this does not amount to a right to be examined by an independent medical practitioner of one’s own choice.⁹

There is reliable evidence that the system of police detention and the lack of adequate safeguards for detainees, considered further below, lead to numerous incidents of ill-treatment of detainees, which on some occasions may amount to torture. In its report of 2005 following a visit to Spain, the European Committee on the Prevention of Torture (CPT)¹⁰ found many consistent allegations of ill-treatment in custody by police or the Civil Guard, and the UN Committee against Torture has also criticised ill-treatment of those held on terrorism charges.¹¹ The Special Rapporteur on Torture in 2004,¹² as well as the Special Rapporteur on Human Rights and Counter-terrorism, in 2008,¹³

---

⁴ Ley de Enjuiciamiento Criminal (LEC) Law 53/1978
⁵ Amended by Organic Law 4/1988 and by Organic Law 13/2003
⁶ Art. 509 (2), LEC. See generally Spain, Fifth periodic report, CCPR/C/ESP/5, 5 February 2008, paras 92-94.
⁷ Article 527 LEC
⁸ Organic Law 13/2003
¹¹ U.N. Committee against Torture, Conclusions and Recommendation, op cit, para.10. This recommendation, made in 2002, was in relation to the then five day period of incommunicado detention.
¹³ UN Special Rapporteur on Human Rights and Counter-terrorism Concludes Visit to Spain, 14 May 2008
recommended abolition of system of incommunicado detention, as did this Committee in its previous Concluding Observations on Spain.\(^{14}\)

The ICJ considers that incommunicado detention, even where judicially supervised as in the Spanish system, cannot adequately protect the safety of detainees. Prolonged incommunicado detention can itself amount to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment\(^{15}\) and there is good evidence that the system as applied in Spain facilitates ill-treatment of detainees. This issue should be addressed as a matter of priority by the Human Rights Committee in its review of the periodic report of Spain.

Access to lawyers

Risks of arbitrary detention and of ill-treatment or torture during police detention and in particular in incommunicado detention are particularly acute in Spain as a result of limitations on rights of access to lawyers, both in law and in practice.

Under Spanish law, persons arrested and held in police custody have a general right to a lawyer of their choice.\(^{16}\) This right is restricted in respect of terrorism suspects however, who when held incommunicado, do not have the right to nominate a lawyer; rather, they are assigned a lawyer designated from an official list of the Bar Association.\(^{17}\) The assigned lawyer does not have a right to communicate privately with his client.\(^{18}\) The Spanish Constitutional Court has upheld the mandatory assignment of a lawyer, as compatible both with the Spanish Constitution and with Spain’s international human rights obligations.\(^{19}\)

In practice, delays in access to assigned lawyers considerably undermine the protection they offer. The law provides that the lawyer must reach the detention centre within eight hours from his or her appointment, and makes it an offence for any public authority or official to prevent or obstruct the exercise of the right to a lawyer.\(^{20}\) However, in practice, the assigned lawyer often arrives only when the detainee is scheduled to make a statement to the police,\(^{21}\) at which point the lawyer’s presence has very little practical protective effect. In its 2005 visit to Spain, the CPT found a consistent pattern of lengthy delays between the request for a lawyer and the lawyer’s arrival at the law enforcement establishment. Moreover, when a lawyer did arrive for the formal statement of the

---

\(^{14}\) CCPR/C/79/Add.61
\(^{15}\) CAT Concluding Observations on the United States, CAT/C.USE.CO/2, 18 May 2006, para.17; HRC General Comment No.20 para.6; report of the Special Rapporteur on Torture on visit to Spain, 2004, op cit, para.34.
\(^{16}\) CCP Article 520 (2)
\(^{17}\) Article 527 (a) LEC
\(^{18}\) Article 527(c) LEC
\(^{19}\) Spanish Constitutional Court, dec. 196/1987, para. 7.
\(^{20}\) Art. 537, Penal Code (CAT/C/55/Add.5) detainee, “such access was, in general, limited to the lawyer’s passive presence while the detained person’s statement was taken and signed.”22 It found several cases in which there were credible allegations of ill-treatment, where detainees did not have access to a lawyer for 22 hours or more following arrest.23

The right of prompt access to a lawyer has been affirmed by this Committee in its General Comment No.20, and prompt access, at least within 48 hours of arrest or detention, is specified by Principle 7 of the UN Basic Principles on the Role of Lawyers.24 As this committee has recognised, prompt access to a competent lawyer, and the ability to communicate privately and effectively with the lawyer, are indispensable safeguards against coerced statements and ill-treatment in custody, as well as against arbitrary detention, and therefore to the protection of rights under Articles 7, 9 and10 of the Covenant. The ICJ considers that, in order to reliably protect the Covenant rights, the principle of immediate access to a lawyer should be established and implemented in Spanish law. This should not be compromised under any circumstances, including in terrorism cases. The law must ensure that the lawyer consults with the detainee in confidence, and in time to give advice prior to any statement being made to the police. Following the initial consultation, access to detainees held in police custody, or in prison custody pending charge, should be regular and substantial, and should respect the confidentiality of lawyer-client meetings and communications.

Judicial review of detention

Spanish law requires that a person suspected of crimes of terrorism be brought before a judge within 72 hours of arrest.25 If it has been requested within the first 48 hours of arrest, the judge can extend the detention for up to another 48 hours. Judicial authorisation is also required for any imposition of incommunicado detention and on any extension of incommunicado status for a further five days, and then a further three days.26 Therefore, while most of the period of incommunicado detention is supervised by the judicial authority, the first 48 or 72 hours – depending on the choice the police makes – are without judicial authorisation.

There are questions regarding the quality of judicial supervision of detention. The CPT found that the requirement for a detainee to be brought before a judge within 72 hours of arrest was, in practice, not rigorously met: “although judges did issue the decision on a person’s release or continued custody within the required time-limits, they did not always do so having physically seen the person”.27 Where, in case of terrorism suspects, a judge is asked to decide whether to extend garde à vue for an additional 48 hours, there is no

---

22 CPT report, op cit, para.24
23 ibid para.23.
24 See also, Human Rights Committee, General Comment 20, Prohibition of torture and cruel treatment or punishment, para.11.
25 CCP Article 520
26 Art. 520 bis, LEC.
27 CPT report op cit, para.43
legal requirement for the detainee to appear before the judge in order for the detention to be extended, though the judge may request the detainee’s production. In practice, it appears that judges do not always require detainees to appear before them.

Judicial review of incommunicado detention is also in practice limited. The Special Rapporteur on Torture’s Report of 2004 noted that he had received “ample information from a variety of sources that in this regard judicial control is more often of a formal and administrative nature than substantive and scrutinizing.” He noted that judicial extensions of incommunicado detention were normally based solely on a reference to an individual’s suspected links with terrorism, and where such links were alleged, the request was usually granted automatically, without the judge exercising his or her right to obtain information personally.

A further problem relates to challenge to the lawfulness of the detention as protected by Article 9 (4) ICCPR. Under the Spanish system, this right can be exercised by filing a writ of habeas corpus. In most cases, habeas corpus petitions are heard by the examining magistrate of the district where the detainee is held; however, in terrorism cases, the application is heard by the Central Instructing Judge of the Audencia Nacional, who is also likely to have ordered the detention. The right to habeas corpus is further undermined by the fact that it is not among the rights that police are required to read to an arrested person. Lack of prompt legal advice, and the isolated state of detainees in incommunicado detention, further restricts the use of habeas corpus.

The ICJ emphasises that prompt review by a court is an essential safeguard against ill-treatment and arbitrary detention. The ICJ is concerned that both the law on judicial review of detention, and its application in practice, are insufficient to safeguard detainees against ill-treatment or arbitrary detention. The law should be amended to ensure that decisions to extend detention always entail the production of the detainee before the court, and the law and practice should ensure that judicial review of detention is real and substantial.

Criminal Investigations, the right to a defence and Secreto de Sumario

Spanish law authorises the use of “secreto de sumario” by which, in criminal investigations, an examining magistrate can totally or partially restrict the availability of information on the investigation, including to the defence. The procedure aims to

---

28 Article 526.3 LEC
29 Report of the Special Rapporteur on Torture, op cit, para.60
30 ibid para.38.
31 Organic law 6/1984 on the Regulation of the Procedure for Habeas Corpus.
32 ibid Article 2
33 Brogan v UK, application nos. 11209/84; Sinan Tanrikulu and others v Turkey (application nos. 00029918/96, 00029919/96 and 00030169/96, 6 October 2005); Yasar Bazancir and others v Turkey, (application nos. 00056002/00 and 0007059/02, 11 October 2005) (6 days detention without judicial supervision breached Article 5.3, despite acute terrorist threat).
34 Article 302 LEC
protect the integrity of judicial investigations, and the Constitutional Court has held that it constitutes a justifiable limitation on the right to defend oneself, in the interests of preventing interference with or manipulation of the investigation. Under Article 302 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, secreto de sumario can be imposed for a period of one month, but the Constitutional Court has interpreted this as allowing for the renewal of secreto de sumario on a monthly basis, provided that it is necessary in the circumstances of the case, until 10 days before the end of the investigation.

Investigations of terrorist crimes are reportedly regularly extended for at least 2 years without the presence of the defence. During this time, the accused may remain in pre-trial detention, under the Code of Criminal Procedure, persons accused of serious offences may be held in pre-trial detention for up to four years, provided that a judge authorises renewal after the first two years of detention. There was prolonged pre-trial detention, for example, of those tried for the Madrid bombings, during which the secrecy of the investigation appears to have been one of the factors which hampered the defence lawyers in providing effective representation and advice to their clients. Renewal of secreto de sumario for extended periods inevitably creates difficulties for defence lawyers who do not have access to detailed information regarding the charges against their clients, or the use of means of investigation such as interception of communications. Where the accused is remanded in pre-trial detention, secreto de sumario also means that the defence lawyer may know little detail of the factual basis for pre-trial detention, and therefore have great difficulty in challenging it.

The ICJ is concerned that the application of the secreto de sumario procedure places unacceptable limits on the right to defend oneself on a criminal charge and risks violation of the right to fair trial under Article 14 ICCPR. The impact of this procedure on the conduct of the defence should be explored by the Committee in its consideration of the periodic report.

Non-refoulement and the use of diplomatic assurances against torture

The ICJ is concerned at a recent case in which diplomatic assurances against torture were sought and attained from the Russian Federation in relation to the extradition of a Chechen suspect on charges of terrorism. These assurances were accepted by the Audencia Nacional, despite the fact that they contained obvious flaws, including a suggestion that treatment of the suspect could be monitored by the UN Committee

---

35 Constitutional Court, Sentence 176/1988
36 Constitutional Court Case 176/1988 (Sentencia)
38 Article 504(2) LEC permits a period of 2 year’s pre-trial detention, renewable once on the decision of a judge, for those accused of crimes carrying sentence of more than three years’ imprisonment.
39 Statement of Martin Scheinin, UN Special Rapporteur on Human Rights and Counter-terrorism concludes visit to Spain, 14 May 2008; Sebastia Salellas, presentation to Eminent Jurists Panel, op cit.
40 Organic Law 13/2003 of 24 October 2003, amending article 506 of the LEC.
Against Torture, which has no such monitoring function. The use of such assurances has been widely criticised as ineffective in protecting against refoulement to face a risk of torture. The European Court of Human Rights has recently held, in Ismoilov v Russia, that diplomatic assurances against torture, provided by the government of a country where torture was systematic, did not provide a reliable guarantee against the risk of ill-treatment to satisfy the obligation of non-refoulement.

The ICJ emphasises that diplomatic assurances against torture are of their nature ineffective, even where the most sophisticated monitoring mechanisms are in place. They are unenforceable, and provide no means of redress for their breach. The ICJ is concerned that the Spanish authorities are willing to use diplomatic assurances as a basis for extradition of a Chechen suspect to Russia, despite the widespread use of torture in Chechnya and the North Caucasus.

Freedom of expression and association

The ICJ is concerned that a number of prosecutions before the Audencia Nacional for crimes of association or collaboration with terrorist groups, risk unjustifiable interference with freedom of association and expression as protected by the Covenant, particularly in relation to civil society organisations and media active in the Basque country. Of particular concern is the prosecution of editors and board members of the Basque language newspaper, Egunkaria, which was closed down by the authorities in 2002, and which remains closed, with its assets frozen. Editors and board members of the paper are charged with membership of an illegal association and collaboration with an armed group. Several of the accused allege that they were tortured in incommunicado detention. The Audencia Nacional has ruled that the prosecution should proceed, despite the recommendation of the prosecutor that it should be dropped for lack of evidence. It is being pursued as a private prosecution, raising concerns amongst Spanish

---

43 Application no.2947/06; see further Saadi v Italy, Grand Chamber, Application no.37201/06; Ryabikin v Russia, Application no. 8320/04.

44 Application no. 2947/06, Para.127

45 Case 18/98; case 33/01; case 44/04.

46 Case 44/04

47 Article 19, Press Statement 14 November 2005, Closure of Basque Newspaper Egunkaria; Reporters without borders, 3 April 2008, Justice Minister urged to conclude judicial proceedings that have kept Basque daily closed since 2003.

48 Carlos Jiménez Villarejo, Evidence to the ICJ Eminent Jurists Panel, 3 July 2007 http://ejp.icj.org/

49 Statement of the prosecutor, Miguel Angel Carballo-Cuevo, 4 December 2006, Court Record No.21/05 lawyers of the abuse of that process.\textsuperscript{50} The ICJ is concerned that such prosecutions may criminalise legitimate debate and civil society activity, and have the potential to interfere unjustifiably with rights under Articles 19 and 22 ICCPR. The Spanish government should be asked to justify the application of the criminal law against media and civil society organisations in this way.

Rendition Flights through Spain

There have been credible reports, including from the investigation of Senator Marty for the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe,\textsuperscript{51} and of the Temporary Committee of the European Parliament (TDIP)\textsuperscript{52} that flights involved in the CIA-run renditions programme landed at Spanish airports, including in Majorca, the Canary Islands and at military bases near Cadiz and Seville, between 2002 and 2006.\textsuperscript{53} Spanish prosecutors continue to investigate the flights and possible crimes on Spanish territory connected with them.\textsuperscript{54} It has been confirmed by the Spanish government that renditions flights have landed in Spain, but the government denies that any crimes occurred on Spanish territory.\textsuperscript{55} Since, however, the US led renditions programme has involved serious and systematic violations by the United States of rights protected in the Covenant, including freedom from arbitrary detention, freedom from torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment, and refoulement to face a risk of such treatment, the use of Spanish airports in the transport of rendered persons engages the positive obligations of Spain to protect against such treatment on its territory, and to investigate whether and how it occurred.

It is welcome that Spanish prosecutors have initiated investigations into flights landing in Spanish airports apparently connected to the renditions programme. In light of the serious nature of the human rights violations involved, the Human Rights Committee should ask the Spanish government what steps it has taken to ensure that no violations of human rights related to renditions take place on Spanish territory, including at military bases on Spanish territory used by other states. The Spanish government should co-operate fully with prosecutors in the investigation of rendition flights, including by providing necessary information and documents.

\textsuperscript{50} Evidence of Carlos Jiménez Villarejo to ICJ Eminent Jurists Panel, op cit.
\textsuperscript{51} Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe, Alleged secret detentions and unlawful inter-state transfers of detainees involving Council of Europe Member States, Doc.10957 12 June 2006 para.103.
\textsuperscript{53} El País, 4 February 2008, La fiscalía busca testigos clave del traslado de presos en los vuelos secretos de la CIA.
\textsuperscript{55} http://jurist.law.pitt.edu, Spain says CIA rendition flights may have used Spanish airports 15 September 2006; Spain says US military flights to Guantanamo not illegal, 2 June 2008, http://www.neurope.eu/articles/87123.php